

This photographic series, entitled "Your whole life would've been different, and the same..." is about understanding loss. Within this work I am attempting to explore how we long for the presence of someone, while ultimately being more impacted by their absence. The images are meant to be an introspection of what would or could have been if things had been different. While death is a conclusion of the physical, the memories continue. Just as loss leaves you with a sense of emptiness, you are left searching for what is missing. In tandem, the images are questioning the relevance of fate versus chance. While loss can bring us sadness, it can also bring us a sense of being blessed with what life presents us.
